EACH ONE TEACH ONE: 14, Part I.

Villanova University, USA, economist Mary L. Hirschfeld received on May 29, 2019, the 4th edition of the International "Economy and Society" award presented by Cardinal Reinhard Marx, sponsored by the Vatican in recognition of her book "Aquinas and the Market: Toward a humane Economy" (Harvard University Press, 2018). Her book constitutes a true dialogue between Theology and Economics and on the vision of St. Thomas Aquinas helping to understand that the Social Doctrine of the Church doesn't actually begin with Pope Leo XIII, but is nourished by roots that reach much further back into Christian tradition. She spoke of being a convert to the Catholic faith: "the Church is regularly replenished with converts like me, and perhaps this is providential. Like Dante, I found myself lost in the woods in mid-life. For my first 37 years, I tried to navigate the world armed with the sensibilities of an educated secular agnostic from America. I had earned a Ph.D. in economics with the idea that the best path to promoting happiness lay in economic development, seeking policies and institutions that would spread material prosperity to all. Yet in my own life, I had found that my own prosperity did little to help me find meaning or happiness. I was hungry for something, but I did not know what I was hungry for. I suffered from anxiety, and I flirted with despair. In all that struggling, I somehow stumbled into the Church, really not knowing why I was there or what it would mean when I knocked on her doors. But what I found was a banquet. The Church offered me what my soul had been hungering for all those years, and I have never looked back. I was so overwhelmed by this banquet I found on my conversion, I decided to give up my job as a tenured professor of economics. I went back to school to study theology. Theology, I thought, had much more to say about how to find genuine happiness than did economics. I intended to leave economics behind. But I found that I could not. When I started my theological studies, people would ask me for insight into questions about economics – things like whether usury is licit, or what it would mean for wages to be just. At first, I did not know how to reply. If I thought about those subjects as an economist, I had to use a way of thinking that denied the banquet I had found in the Church. And on a practical level, it was not at all obvious how to reconcile Christian sensibilities about virtue and justice, with the logic of markets. To give a quick example, it seems obvious that wages should be just – people should be able to lead dignified lives on the basis of the work that they do. But if the market dictates that wages should be lower than that, efforts to raise the wage to a just level could produce unemployment, thereby harming the very people the just wage is meant to help. I did not know how to reconcile the two approaches. My path forward came when I worked on a paper about Aquinas's teachings on "private property." [Thoughts from Jim Fair, ZENIT], Fr. Vincent Pereira, JCD.
